

PhiloTorah This 'n That

WED, 22 Tevet 5785, January 22nd -

Longtime no update to this file.
That's putting it mildly.

Not a great excuse, but it has taken (and is still taking) lots of time and effort to complete our move to our new home. Many, many boxes still to unpack and sort and find place for their contents. It is responsible (I know, I'm really responsible) for the incomplete website each week. Somehow, this week I am ahead of schedule and have already finished most features. Still waiting for some submissions. It is a good thing for my progress each week that some features are submitted weeks in advance, other features I take from websites of the columnists, other features I do on my own, and a few come to me only on Thursday or even Friday morning.

If you are reading this column, I would appreciate an email telling me your favorite and least favorite features, the things you read most often, the things you read once in a while, and the things you hardly ever if at all, read.

Do you read online only, do you print out any of PhiloTorah. If you do print, is it only for yourself are for others, as well.

Do you open PhiloTorah on a computer, on your phone, or both?

Do you watch the videos? Do you listen to the audio of Zoom shiurim? Do you use the external links?

BTW, the number at the very bottom of the webpage is the ongoing total of different people who have gone on to the website. Once a person enters the website once, his subsequent use of the page does not affect the number. This means that over 14,000 different people have been to the website. But, I have no idea (I really should put other counters on the site) how many visits each week. So tell me about yourself. In general and specifically in relation to PhiloTorah.

Thank you.
